Rightists report shelling in Beirut

BEIRUT, Feb. 14 (R)--The rightwing Falangist radio said Syrian troops serving with the Arab peace-keeping force today shelled residential districts in the southern suburbs of Beirut, First reports spoke of seven people wounded, two of them seriously, it said. Explosions could be heard in various parts of the Lehanese capital. The radio quoted a rightwing spokesman as saying the Syrians were using heavy tanks, mortars and machineguns. Militias had been ordered to exercise self-restraint and abide by a U.N. Security Council ceasefire call made last October, he said. The spokesman said the attack was designed to embarrass the Lebanese authorities following a visit vesterday to Damascus by Lebanon's Defence Minister Victor Khoury. The minister's talks in the Syrian capital dealt with the planned deployment of Lebanese troops in the southern region bordering Israel.

Agreement on Britain's labour unrest reached.

LONDON, Feb. 14 (R)-Britain's embattled government and trade unions today finally reached a long-term agreement aimed at easing chronic labour unrest and regulating pay bargaining.

After six weeks of widespread strikes, Prime Minister James Callaghan hoped the Saint Valentine's Day pact would help check the slump in his popularity and boost his chances in this year's general election.

The so-called "concordar" does nothing to tackle the current wave of strikes but commits both sides to helping reduce inflation to five per cent within three years.

Mr. Callaghan told parliament the agreement was "an important beginning." Conservative opposition leader Margaret Thatcher dismissed it as a boneless wonder.

The Prime Minister, who failed in an earlier attempt to seal an

In a message to the Emir from the Britannia the Queen said today she bad been moved by a warm welcome and "your tradinonal Arah hospitality."

She said Kuwait was a model society "in its efforts to fulfil the spiritual, educational and material needs of its people."

agreement with unions last November, said the Trades Union Congress (TUC) representing 21 million members had pledged to try to limit strikes and picketing.

The announcement came on a day of mixed strike news for Britons. Some 19,000 car workers at British Leyland's (BL) biggest plant, in Longbridge, Birmingham, ended a week-long unofficial stoppage.

But there was no end in sight to the rotating strikes by 1.5 million low-paid "dirty job" workers. Hundreds of schools were closed because caretakers refused to unlock them, many hospitals were only accepting emergency cases and rotting rubbish piled up.

Mr. Callaghan told the House of Commons the TUC had undertaken to issue guidance to unions c o vering three areas-procedures for avoiding disputes, the conduct of strikes when they arise and the so-called "closed shop", which makes union membership compulsory at some work-places.

The "concordat" declared strikes should only be used as a last resort and agreements property observed.

It also pledged unions to seeing that essential services and supplies were maintained during strikes.

Unidentified gunmen wearing black gasmasks invaded the embassy while snipers poured automatic fire on the red-brick chancery building, sending diplomats diving for cover under their desks, an American army colonel said.

Ambassador William Sullivan immediately telephoned for help to the headquarters of the Islamic revolutionary leader, Avatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. Squads of Islamic police in motley uniforms rushed "in the best traditions of the U.S. cavalry" to the rescue of some 100 U.S. embassy staff trapped inside, Col. Lee Holland told newsmen.

No coherent picture of the drama nor an official casualty toll had emerged after several hours. Guards at the Prime Minister's office said four Iranians had been killed in the attack, which they blamed on the Shah's political police, Savak.

Hospitals reported four Iranians wounded, one seriously, and said one unidentified American was also injured.

The marxist Fedaveen-e-Khalo (people's Guerrilla Organisation) tonight denied that it was responsible for the embassy attack. "We did not order our supporters to attack embassies," a spokesman told the organisation's first press conference.

No organisation claimed responsibility for the assault.

The attackers smashed some communications equipment and ransacked part of the buildings. according to American newsmen. But Col. Holland, escorted to the gates of the embassy later by Islamic policemen in civilian clothes, stressed that no documents or equipment had been removed.

The guerrilla assault brought home to many Iranians the dangers of uncontrolled gun law swamping the country despite urgent appeals by Ayatollah Khomeini for the surrender of tens of thousands of weapons seized from military armouries during the tumultuous Tehran uprising last weekend. Provisional Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan immediately ordered official militia to guard the British embassy and other potential targets. Diplomatic sources said some embassies were burning sensitive papers as a precautionary measure.

Offensive defences

WE ARE constantly being told that Israel wants a peace treaty with Egypt in order to allow it to get out from under the enormous hurden of having to arm itself to the teeth against the prospect of another war. Up to now, the United States has been more than happy to oblige Israel in meeting these security needs.

Lest anyone be misled into thinking that the prospective treaty with Egypt in any way changes this relationship, we have just heard a reiteration. from U.S. Defence Secretary Harold Brown in Israel. of America's commitment to Israel's security interests. If anything, it is likely that Washington has offered substantial inducements to Israel, hy way of security guarantees, to nudge it along the long and winding road from Camp David. This is not to say that the U.S. is prepared to provide, or that Israel plans to ask for, more and better hardware for its arsenal: after all, President Carter is engaged in fearsome hudgetcutting, and both foreign aid and foreign economic assistance programmes, even those involving longstanding and "vital" allies such as Israel, have come under the knife of

So it probably suits Washington to he told, in the course of Mr. Brown's visit, that Israel is planning to cut its "long-range" military purchases from the U.S. by 25 per cent, in anticipation of the signing of a treaty with Egypt.

But let us not lose sight of three things: the exact extent of the U.S. commitment to Israel which is enshrined in a specially sacred place in the hallowed halls of American foreign policy; the way in which Israel is now able to point to developments in Iran as a further challenge to its security; and the unstated plans Israel no doubt has for transferring its military preparedness from a neutralised western front to its northern and eastern fronts.

.The first of these points has just been neatly restated in Washington: Israel is getting $1,785 million in American economic assistance, and $1,000 million in military sales credits with which to buy 90 more F-15 and F-16 jet fighters and other items. American assistance, says Assistant Secretary of State Harold Saunders, is designed to support two underlying objectives: to help Israel to maintain its security as a "stable, Western-oriented democracy," and to "undergird the realisation of a just, lasting and comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli con-

We know that the U.S. is aware of its web of often conflicting national interests in the Middle East, but we fail to see how, after the Camp David experience, Washington could any longer feel that pouring arms into an aggressive and expansionist Israel could possibly contribute to a "just, lasting and comprehensive settlement." Israel's demonstrated contempt for the objectives and requirements of the Camp David process-even limited as they are--and its actions in southern Lebanon, should put paid to such a misguided concept once and for all.

These realities, in our view, undercut any pretensions Israel may now make to the U.S. about its "defensive" posture. And, if the U.S. is truly concerned about reassuring its Arab friends about its true interests and intentions in this region, it should not allow itself to be fooled at this precarious moment by either Israeli protestations of weakness...or hoasts of strength.

ARAB PRESS COMMENTARY

AL RA'I Wednesday says the Ayatollah Khomeini-led revolution in Iran may be considered as one of the most successful popular uprising that spared much bloodshed and immediately brought back security and stability within a relatively short time.

The newspaper says that in his cable to Imam Khomeini, His Majesty King Hussein sent his best wishes to the brotherly people of Iran, hoping that Iran, under the new regime and guided by the principles of Islam, would play a big role in the march of the Muslim nation lowards its noble goals of mobilising its energies and building up its strength for recovering its holy places and its legitimate rights in bolstering its civilisation.

No doubt, the newspaper says, Iran's revolution represents a real backing for Arah forces that have been engaging the Zionist aggression for over three decades. "And we hope that the new regime in Iran will play its part in confronting this menace," the AL DUSTOUR takes a suspicious view of the Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan's statement that the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) is an important factor that cannot be ignored during discussions for a Middle East peace settlement and answer to the Palestinian refugee problem.

Under the heading "Why is Dayan courting the PLO?!" the newspaper considers the move a ploy to make the Israeli government appear in pain trying to convince the Knesset and Israeli public opinion to accept a "bigger concession" by putring out this description of the PLO. Mr. Dayan's statement may also have been meant to create a some what suitable climate for the resumed ministerial peace talks due to take place in Camp David later this month between Egypt, Israel and the U.S., the newspaper writes.

By Ron Cathell Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN, Feb. 14-Jordan has added another country to its list of. friendly nations with which it has official diplomatic relations.

During the first week of 1979. Australia opened an embassy here, using a suite of rooms in the Jordan Intercontinental Hotel to set up its first official diplomatic ties with Jordan.

Ten days ago, the emhassy moved to its permanent location in Jabal Amman, across the street from the Greek embassy, in the former residence of the Iraqi ambassador. "It cost us $200,000 to put the place back in shape." Charge d'Affaires Mr. David Wadham told the Jordan Times yesterday. And it shows: the paint smells fresh; the woodwork gleams with a new coat of varnish and the marble floors still hold their lustre from too few footsteps.

In the absence of Mr. Neil Truscott, who lives in Damascus as the accredited ambassador to Jordan. Svria and Lebanon, Mr. Wadham will be representing the political and economic interests of 14 million Australians and their government. Although Australia has nearly the same geographical area as the United States, it has fewer citizens (including its aborigines) than the combined population of New York City and Chicago.

Although only last year Australia had intended to establish an embassy in Jordan sometime within five years, after the visit of His Highness Crown Prince Hassan to Australia last autumn, the ball really got rolling. During dinner one evening, Prince Hassan asked the Australian prime minister when if ever, his country was going to get its emhassy set up. "Why Your Highness," the prime minister replied, "all you had to do was ask." Within four months an Australian Emhassy opened for husiness in Amman.

The reason Australia has an embassy here, Wadham explained, is to have a national representative "on the spot, 10 know Jordan's point of view on the critical issues facing this area. We don't want to have just a lump. regional view. We want to get a feeling of what Jordan thinks about these issues," he said. "In this transient world, the more friends you have, the better."

Australia also wants to improve economic cooperation. So far, there are only two Australian business firms in Jordan, besides an archaeological team and an irrigation project. But now, with the help of an embassy, more Australian business is expected to come to Jordan. Mr. Wadham thinks that nearly all Australian enterprises to come here will set up joint ventures with Iordan's private sector.

Mr. Wadham isn't sure what markets may be available in Australia for Jordanian commerce. But he does see the possibility of Australia shipping meat-beef, mutton, lamb-and wheat to Jordan. He also thinks his country could benefit Jordan

Tomatoes vs. steel

By Rami G. Khouri

THERE ARE many lessons to be learned from: the events in iran, and it is one of the privileges of a newspaper columnist that he can make believe he knows what the most important ones are. Without wishing to dwell on the Iranian crisis too much, I do suggest that the spinoffs from it are potentially immense in terms of the socioeconomic development of the Arah World, and, hy implication, the rest of the Third World. I'm not talking about the Islamic aspect of the Iranian "revolution", but rather the fundamental, underlying socio-economic developmental forces that have been at work in Iran for the past, say, ten years. If it took a religious personality to act as the catalyst and leader of the Iranian revolt. I suggest that the great implications of Iran for the Arab. World are not religious, but economic.

One can analyse the Iranian revolt on various levels, depending on one's inclinations. It could be seen as a purely religious movement, or an anti-Western one, or an anti-capitalist movement rooted in Marxist impulses of a proletariat rebelling against the development of a capitalistbourgeois society centred around the Iranian military-industrial complex, a complex that was becoming formidable by any standards. ft could be the Iranians felt they were being pushed too far, too fast, or that the masses of people did not feel they were sharing in the country's oil income.

Whatever the precise set of revolt-provoking impulses, the fact is that the Iranian people, under the guidance of a religious leader, have served clear warning that they are not satisfied with the direction or manner of their country's development during the past decade or two. The post-1974 rise in oil income only aggravated Iran's fundamental developmental imbalance; it did not initiate it. Iran, then, may be the first casualty of the oil states' feverish rush to build industrial plants and assorted service and manufacturing industries during the oil-rich years to provide the economic base for the years after the oil runs out. The fact may be-and I think it is -- that the very basic socio-economic development policies that have been adopted by the oil producers, epitomised by Iran, as well as the Arab states in general, is all wrong.

Not only is it unrealistic to think that petrochemical plants, steel mills and drydocks can ever provide the industrial base for a post-oil economy that is supposed to generate the same national income as the oil states now enjoy due to. their petroleum exports, but it is also now obvious that the populations of oil-producing states will only go so far before rebelling against what its think is a wrong policy. Harding:

An Appreciation

Mr. Harding was born in Tientsin, northern China, on Dec. 8, 1901. His early life was spent in the Far East, mostly in Singapore, which he left in 1913 on the death of his father, when he was taken felt towards the late King. to England.

A chance meeting with the late Margaret Murray enabled him to meet the then awe-inspiring Flinders Petrie, the giant who bestrode all archaeological endeavours in the Middle East. Petrie had three qualifications for membership on his dig: a knowledge of the history (biblical and otherwise) of the site you were digging: no university degree and a capacity for living on nothing except a few dried dates. Mr. Harding passed the test, From 1926 until 1932, he worked with Petric at Tell Jemmeh, Tell Al Fara (South) and Tell Al Ajjul in the Gaza district of southern Palestine (as it was then called).

But it was at Tell Al Duweir (the biblical Luchish) that he came into his own. By that time, he was Assistant Director of the Wellcome Archaeological Research Expedition to the Near East. This folded up with the murder of Mr. inscriptions in the Wadi Rumm, which was hailed Starcky, who was on his way to Jerusalem for the at the time as a model publication of that type of opening of the Palestine Museum.

In that same year, 1936, Mr. Harding was appointed Chief Curator of Antiquities for the Emirate of Trans-Jordan. When the country became independent and henceforth styled as the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, his title was in that post until 1956. It was prohably the most fruitful, rewarding and centainly the happiest period of his life.

He was a horn musician; had a perfect ear and played the piano quite beautifully, be it Beethoven or the latest jazz hit. Perhaps because of this finely altuned ear, he could speak any foreign language within a few months. He loved Arabic; the cadences appealed to him and he probably spoke it better than any other foreigner.

He became a great friend of the late King Talal, for whom he had the greatest respect. They understood each other. During his stay in hospital in at Jerash, where he made his home for many Amman before he went to England for treatment years.

WITH THE DEATH of Gerald Lankesier Hard- late last year, nothing touched Mr. Harding more than the flowers he received from His Majesty King Hussein, His Highness Crown Prince Hassan and Princess Alia. In this and many other ways, King Talal's descendants continued in recent years to repay the affection which Mr. Harding During his period of office in Amman, Mr. Harding was responsible for the erection of the present Museum on the Citadel, at the same time making sure that the Citadel would be preserved for posterity as one of Jordan's most important cultural heritages. He was the founder of the Annual of the Department of Antiquities of Jordan. He was also responsible, in collaboration with the late Very Rev. Father Roland de Vaux. for the excavation at Quirran of the Dead Sea To his horror and dismay, Mr. Harding was asked to leave Jordan, with all the other British officials, in 1956. He went to Lebanon and continued with his work on Safaine inscriptions. He published a monumental Index and Concordance of North Arabian (pre-Islamic) Inscriptions, Hehad previously published a book on Thamudie inscription.

Mr. Harding was never really happy in Lebanon; his heart was in Jordan and when life in Lebanon became difficult for foreigners, particularly like him, living as he did, in a mountain village, he was very happy to come back to Jordan. changed to Director of Antiquities. He remained and to know that his judgement was still valued by the Department of Antiquities.

Gerald Harding was probably best known for his very scholarly, yet immensely popular, book, "The Antiquities of Jordan," first published in 1952. He had lately been working on a new edition of it in collaboration with his long-time colleague Crystal Bennett.

Mr. Harding, who leaves no immediate family survivors, will be cremated in London on Thursday. His ashes will then be brought back to Jordan and, after a service of thanksgiving for his life and

One becomes three and better

Devolution has come to Britain's National Theatre on the south bank of the Thames in London in the form of a decision by the director, Sir Peter Hall, to appoint individual directors with overall artistic responsibility for productions at the three theatres that make up the National complex - the Olivier, the Lytteiton and the Cottesioe.

By Sir Harold Hobson

According to Sir Peter Hall the changes which he, as director, has decided to make at the National Theatre provide the most far reaching experiment in devolution yet attempted at any theatre.

They stem from the fact that the National, is in reality, not one theatre, but three. For the open space Olivier, the proscenium arch Lyttelion, and the flexibly experimental, tiny cottesloe. though all on one site by the side of the Thames, are all architecturally independent of each other.

The National is a vast organisation, and, says Sir Peter, there is a danger of its becoming impersonal. It is to aviod this feeling that he has given each theatre its own director, two for the Olivier, They will be expected to impose on their theatres a particular and recognisable character.

Sir Peter however, will retain ultimate control. He will decide for instance, what share of the National's financial resources each theatre will get. But within that limit the directors will have complete artistic responsibility. They will decide the sort of plays they want to produce, which actors to employ, and what style of production they wish to evolve.

William Gaskill, who has had wide experience with the social drama of the English Stage Company: and Christopher Morahan. whose background is theatrically closer allied to the English tradition of high comedy, will be in charge of separate companies at the Olivier-one of the world's largest and most splendid open stage theatres.

The Olivier's resources are especially well suited to the presentation of the great classic plays in its reportory. But there are two approaches to the classics. Generally they afford unrivalled opportunities for great actors and actresses--and this is the way that they have usually been treated in

But a decade or so ago, in a remarkable production of the Restoration comedy, "The Recruiting Officer". Gaskill showed that the classics could yield rich results to a director who considered them from the point of view of social comment. Instead of the customary glitter of Restoration wit, and the peacocklike display of 17th century costumes, he revealed the essential shabbiness and grubbiness of the whole business of tricking simple minded men into the army.

It is probable that in dealing with his share of classic revivals at the Olivier Gaskill will adopt a similar sociological approach. There is no doubt some significicance in the fact that his company of 15 players will be run on egalitarian principles. The members, it is said, all receive the same salary.

To Christopher Morahan will be left the task of making the classics shine and glitter. He will alsohave a company of 15--but it will be led by actors and actresses of renown, drawing, no doubt, corresponding remuneration. It will be fascinating to watch how the two methods of approaching the classics interact and contrast at the

The direction of the Lyttelton has been given to Michael Rudman, who has built for himself a big reputation at the samll Hampstead Theatre. The Lyttelton will stage revivals of British plays written in the heyday of the proscenium arch. But it will also present new plays--as it did recently with David Hare's "Plenty" that are suited to a proscenium arch theatre. In many ways the shape of the three theatres will influence -indeed, almost dictate -- the kind of new plays which they stage.

This is eminently true of the small Correstoe, which is really just a bare room that can be modified as occasion requires. At the Cottesloe, Bill Bryden is already well known for the presentation of plays that involve players and audiences moving freely among each other. He is a master of participatory, as Gaskill is of innovatory, theatre, and he will no doubt ontinue with productions of this

But it must be emphasised that though, within the scope of the budgets allotted to them, each director will be free to impose his personality on the theatre to which he is assigned, final responsibility rests with Sir Peter. His will be the brain brooding over the whole National Theatre, and it is he who will decide which are the main lines that it will follow.

Sir Peter Hall, director of Britain's National Theatre, in front of the theatre buildings along the Thames in London.

One of the world's fastest trains to serve France

PARIS -- France's T.G.V. (Train a Grande Vitesse - Fast-Speed Train) achieved 282 km per hour on December 5 between Colmar and Strasbourg. This was not a new world rail record, as some enthusiastic people would like to have believed, even though it is the same company, the SNCF (Societe Nationale des Chemins de fer Francais), which holds the record of 331 km per hour, which was achieved in 1955. The fact is that the SNCF engineers were not seeking a record this time: the extraordinary thing about the latest feat is the rapid development of the TGV and the fact that it will become a new system of transport as soon as in 1982, on the Paris-Lyon line.

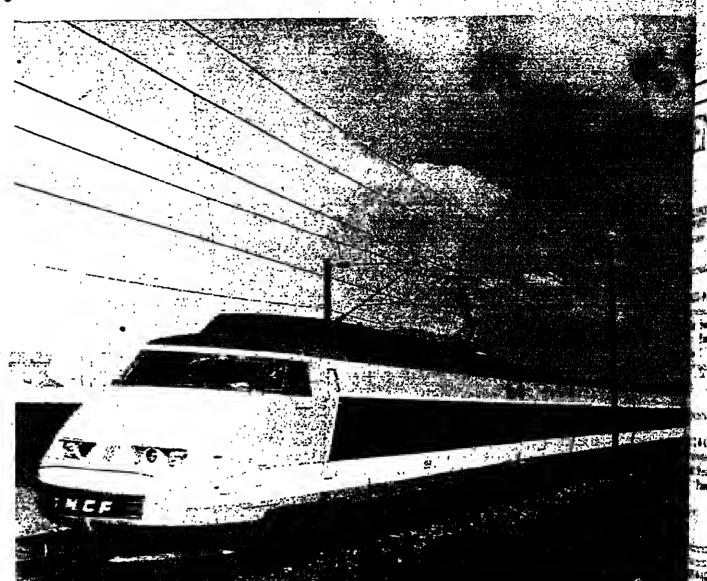

It all began only a dozen years . ago. It was becoming obvious at the time that the Paris-Lyon line-which has four lanes over the major part of its distance-was reaching saturation point: 250 trains per day were using it. And the traffic was becoming strangled by the two-lane-only bottleneck at the entrance to the Burgundy region. The officials of the SNCF faced a difficult choice: to spend heavily in improving the existing route, as far as possible; or to build a new line which, being more direct, would be 420 kilometres long instead of 515 kilometres. They chose the second alternative and decided to make the fastspeed train.

A commission of officials then spent a lot of time working out the relative profitability of aircraft, aerotrain and TGV-by testing each against the others. The TGV was the victor. It took years for other studies to be made, win the government's approval, and so on. Meanwhile, however, the SNCF was working on the scheme. It commissioned the companies Alsthom (the "foreman"), Brissonneau and Lotz, M.T.E. and Turbomeca to produce a gas-turbine prototype train to be able to experiment this new idea of high-speed passenger transport between big urban centres.

The TGV 001, an impressive prototype, covered more than 100,000 kilometres in one year on the track between Bordeaux and Spain. Exhaustive tests were carried out for safety, endurance and reliabillty of the material: six years of experiments and 450,000 kilometres covered, including 20,000 kms at the cruising speed of 260 kilometres per hour. In December 1972, a speed of 318 kilometres per hour was reached. For everything in the TGV is concelved for speed: its streamlined shape, light-suspension bogey wheels, four braking systems...even though the train is not an avant-garde machine--it mostly uses techniques which long ago proved their worth in other fields.

The train's commercial exploitation, on the other hand, really will be revolutionary. All passengers from Paris wishing to go to the Alps or the Midi, Switzerland and Italy will be helped by the TGV, as Mr. Jacques Pelissier, president of the SNCF's managing council.

points out. The train will in effect cover half of France. From 1982, the TGV (classic electric version) will link Paris to Lyon in less than two hours and, not long afterwards. Paris to Marseille in four hours 45 minutes. Some 87 TGV trains have already been ordered.

Prices of tickets will be very. reasonable-and it is easy to understand why "Air Inter" France's domestic airline, is getting worried at the prospect of soon losing a quarter of its passenger traffic (two million clients) to the TGV. (Radio France)

The art of teaching sports

Sports Academy and competition is fierce. There will be a shortage of skilled sports teachers, trainers and instructors for decades and the Cologne diploma is a qualification acknowledged all over the world. Unlike its counterparts in Leipzig and Moscow, Cologne trains teachers rather than super-athletes. Theory and science make up sixty per cent of the three to five-year course. Ten per cent of the 1,000 women and 2,000 men students are foreigners from more than fifty countries. (DaD photo)

U.S.-Mexico talks to begin

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 (R)--President Carter begins a three-day visit to Mexico today with hopes of opening a new relationship and an access route to Mexico's vast new oil reserves.

Mexico's actual 40 billion barrel reserves and potential reserves of 200 billion barrels--larger than Saudi Arabia's if confirmed-bold the key to the outcome of talks with President Jose Lopez Portillo in Mexico City.

the north to treat it as a major

President Lopez Portillo indicated in interviews this week that cooperation on oil depended to a large extent on U.S. willingness to compromise on immigration and other problems.

The United States is building new border fences and trying to slow the flow of illegal Mexican immigrants, estimated to total between 500,000 and 800,000 a

Mexico opposes what it calls the "tortilla curtain" and views the illegal immigration as a safety valve for its poverty and 40 per cent unemployment rate, which cannot be cured until oil production gets into full swing many years into the future.

Another irritant is Mexico's resentment over a veto by Energy Secretary James Schlesinger of the proposed sale of Mexican natural gas to six U.S. oil companies in 1977 at a price higher than that paid for domestic and Canadian

The veto and attempts to halt the illegal immigration are viewed by Mexico as further examples of a long-standing U.S. policy treating it as a third-rate power.

U.S. officials said President Carter and President Lopez Portillo were not expected to reach any specific agreements but hoped to open dialogue that would lead to solutions stressing Mexico's emergence as a major power.

In an interview with Mexican television on the eve of his arrival there, Mr. Carter acknowledged

Barre leaves Quebec with muted salute

MONTREAL, Feb. 14 (R)--French Prime Minister Raymond Barre last night ended a six-day visit to Canada during which he successfully reassured both the federal Canadian Government and the Quebec separatists of France's good intentions.

"I did not come to Ottawa or Quebec to create incidents," be told a press conference bere shortly before flying bome-and his low-key approach during the tour ensured that none occurred.

Perbaps the most tense moment came here yesterday in an incident recalling. President Charles de Gaulle's famous salute to French-Canadians of "Long live nebec" vive Quebec libre") from the balcony of Montreal's City Hall in 1967.

Mr. Barre, also standing on a balcony, looked down at hundreds of flag-waving French-Canadians who were hoping for a similar ges-

Mr. Carter has said the U.S. is interested in buying Mexican gas and oil but acknowledged Mexico's right to produce them at the pace it deemed proper.

President Lopez Portillo has repeatedly stressed that Mexico will not create more oil revenue than it can safely absorb, clearly indicating his government will limit output much below the figure the U.S. bopes for.

Mexico's oil production target this year is about two million barrels a day with a little over 700,000 barrels earmarked for exports, principally to the U.S.

Bhutto given 10-day stay of execution

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan, Feb. 14 (R)-The Pakistan Supreme Court today stayed the execution of condensed ex-premier Zuifikar Ali Bhutto for ten days, It said it would hold a formal hearing on Feb. 24 to decide whether to admit a defence petition challenging the court's rejection of his appeal against the death sentence for ordering the murder of a political opponent.

The court was meeting only a day before Mr. Bhutto, 51. became liable to be hanged. Last Tuesday the court rejected Mr. Bhutto's appeal against the death sentence by a 4-3 majority.

Chief defence lawyer Yahya Bakhtiar asked the court for a further three weeks' stay, rather than the ten days granted, in order to prepare more grounds for the petition. But Chief Justice Anwar-ul-Haque said the court felt the petition should go ahead

The petition, challenging the appeal judgement on the grounds of errors apparent in the record, is the last avenue open to Mr. Bhuno in the courts to bave his conviction and death sentence

If the court dismisses the petition, as many believe likely, only army ruler General Mohammad Zia-ul-Haq can decide to commute the sentence. But Mr. Bhurto has said he will not petition for clemency and has forbidden his family to petition in his behalf.

Catholic Church pledges to fight Latin America's poverty, oppression

PUEBLA, Mexico, Feb. 14 speeches by Pope John Paul (R)-The Catholic Church has denouncing injustice and calling pledged to fight to end poverty and oppression in Latin America.

A declaration by Latin American bishops last night attacked "scandalous inequality" caused by unfettered capitalism and harsh military regimes which it said murdered, kidnapped and tortured. The church had a duty to involve itself in politics and campaign for justice, the statement

The outspoken declaration was likely to spar opposition to authoritarian governments in a continent where balf the world's 730 million Catholics live.

China welcomes Sihanouk

Kampuchean (Cambodian) head of state Prince Norodom Sihanouk arrived in Peking last night to a warm welcome from Chinese leaders who apparently see him as the nationalist all Kampucheans can rally around to defeat Vietnam.

The prince stepped off a Chine Boeing 707 sent to Tokyo to collect him and was bugged by Vice Premiers Deng Xiaoping and Li Xian-

The prince told French television earlier this month that be was going to China in response to a "pressing request" by Mr. Deng.

Prince Sihanouk came to Peking just before Vietnamese-backed forces took over the Kampachean capital last month. He then went to the United Nations and denounced what be termed "Vietnamese aggression" against the Chinesesupported Pol Pot government, which is now fighting a guerrilla

The prince later said be would not cooperate with the Pol Pot forces although he would still work for his country's independence Diplomats in Peking were not sure what Prince Sihanouk's future role might be as he has rejected both the Pol Pot government that kept him under bouse arrest for nearly three years and China's polices towards his country, and has himself been scorned by the Vietnamese. But China recently called for a national, democratic and patriotic united front to defeat the Vietnamese-backed forces and some diplomats believe that Peking sees Prince Sihanouk as its leader.

ideological differences between rival wings of the Arab Baath Socialist Party ruling in the two countries.

The conference attacked the free market economy as putting economic before social interests.

Mr. Hassan said agreement in principle bad been reached on assessing Iraq's and Syria's requirements for oil by-products to aviod the establishment of dual projects.

The two neighbouring countries signed an agreement in Bagbdad last week covering Iraqi oil shipments through Syria. They also signed agreements for technical cooperation in the oil industry.

The accords are part of moves designed to establish close cooperation and eventual unity following reconciliation between the two states consecrated in a national charter for joint action sealed last October.

PARIS-A loudly trumpeted plan by the French Government to open up more jobs to workless young men and women has failed to make more than a slight dent in their ranks after a full year in operation. The proportion of youngsters under the age of 25 among France's 1.3 million unemployed at the end of 1978 was 46 per cent--exectly the same as twelve months earlier.

Since these 620,000 workless young people represent 15 per cent of the four million acrive, members of their age group, this means that one young person out. of every seven in France is looking

This is a gloomy situation for the youngsters concerned and a serious setback for Premier Raymond Barre who, in the summer of 1977, announced an ambinous programme to provide jobs for school-leavers.

This programme, which was proudly called "the National Employment Pact for Youth", was drawn up between the government and the Employers' Federation, the Conseil National du Patronat Français. In exchange for undertakings by the employers to create new jobs, the state exonerated many of these from social security contributions.

The employers were also allowed to limit most of their contracts to a period of six months toone year, so youngsters had no guarantee that these relatively short periods of apprenticeship would lead to long-term employ-

When the Barre job plan was announced, 400,000 youngsters were haunting the labour exchanges. A year later the government announced that 535,000 young people had benefitted in one way or another from the Employment Pact.

About 40 per cent of them had ubtained what were called "preemployment contracts'. These guaranteed them one year's work without any obligation for the employer to pay social security contributions. But most of these young men and women are now' back in the dole quenes.

Roughly 35 per cent undertook traineeships in factories and offices for periods of between six and eight months. These are paid for by the state at a rate equal to 90 per cent of the minimum legal wage (just under £45 a week) and are directed principally at youngsters under 20 years who have signed on as unemployed for the

The third category is also composed of trainees who are paid at the same rate but are hired by government departments mostly attached to the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Culture and Environment.

Paris taxi firms have taken advantage of the Barre Pact in order to make a practice of hiring nntrained drivers on six month contracts and then firing them at the end of their guaranteed stint.

Another youngster wrote in from Montpellier, Southern France: "I had a diploma as a mechanic, but the only job I've been able to find is a cook's assistant in a restaurant. I work up to 80 bours a week and by the time I've paid for my rent and clothes and my meals on my days off there's not a penny left of my salary of £180 a month."

When they get jobs, French youngsters put in much longer working weeks than their elders. One out of three works more than 45 bours a week and one in five does over 48 hours. They also have twice as many accidents at work. While representing 20 per cent of the total active population, they perform 27 per cent of the unskilled jobs. The National Employment Pact for youth is now in its second year. But already its sights have been lowered. For 1978-1979 the employers are offering only 49,000 guaranteed jobs, 40 per cent fewer than for the launching

This is in spite of the govemment's readiness to wipe out 50 per cent of the social security contributions for firms with fewer than 500 employees who are willing to take on more youngsters.

The first year of the Pact's creation cost the state £600 million. The employers' share totalled £150 million. Bnt this sum was merely transferred to the Pact from a professional training fund to which they already paid a levy.

Each autumn, as another 700,000 French youngsters arrive on the labour market after leaving schools and universities, the politicians sit up and ask whether they are about to witness the explosion of pent-up frustrations and disillusion. The tenth anniversary of the mini-revolution of 1968 has passed off peacefully. But what about 1979?
